In a period of sustained volatility and growth challenges, finance professionals are required to bring a much broader range of finance skills to the table. The challenges faced by finance functions in supporting businesses are not limited to a particular accounting or finance discipline. To strive to become world class, finance functions must excel in a broad range of capabilities, from supporting businesses to manage risk, developing effective strategies for growth, driving financial insight, continuing to maintain appropriate levels of control across the organisation as well as ensuring its statutory and regulatory responsibilities are met. ACCA recently released a report entitled “The complete finance professional 2013” discusses on the future of the finance function and outlines why broad-based finance qualifications remain valuable and why businesses need finance skills and capabilities across the entire finance value chain.

ACCA has the pleasure to invite you to participate in this conference which will explore the future of finance and the required skills and attributes to become complete finance professionals. Participants will also receive updates on the tax implications from Budget 2014 proposed measures as well as recent tax developments in 2013 which will boost the nation towards the desirable goals
